"Yaaba": A Tale of a West African Queen

By Marco Werman

NEW YORK — Idrissa Oue-draogo, the filmmaker from Burkina Faso, West Africa, sat in his room at New York's Empire Hotel, surrounded by sheets and blankets and a bit bewildered by the pile of items he had to pack into his valise for that day's trip to Japan. The previous night at Alice Tully Hall across the street. Ouedraogo had charmed the sold-out house with his feature film "Yaaba."

His thoughts were interrupted by the telephone. It was a strictly business conversation in French in which he explained his busy itinerary to yet another producer curious about his plans.

Ouedraogo's latest film. "Yaaba," which translates as "Granny," takes place in the country's bleak Sahel region. It tells a story of an ill-behaving village boy and an elderly woman who is rejected by the other residents in the hamlet because they Idrissa Ouedraogo, the West African director, and villagers Following his three-day ap-pearance at the New York Film in a scene from "Yaaba."

Festival. Ouedraogo was accom-

think she is a witch

Ouagadougou's film institute was close to his house.

From there he moved on to the Institut d'Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques in Paris and received his degree in 1985.

Ouedraogo's reasons for making "Yaaba" are just as guileless as his reason for becoming a cinematographer. "I wanted to show how similar the range of human emotions is all over the world. We are basically all the same and respond to joy, sadness, anger, content in the same way." Though Ouedraogo's two feature films have been financed in part by the Marxist government of Burkina Faso, the latitude for expressing himself is great. "I used to feel that African filmmakers had to work and struggle together as militants, as a unit," he said. "But we are all individuals. We all have different things to say. I don't think infighting is good for us, but competition will make us all better '

One thing European and American audiences chuckle over when they see the credits for Ouedraogo's films is the overabundance of panying "Yaaba" to Tokyo, then reviews, the festival jury handed States. According to Talbot and try, was not as well received in the they all his family? back for the Chicago Filin Festi- the grand prize to "Heritage Ouedraogo, this was the first time United States; and audiences who "If you open the Ouagadougou val, a quick stopover in New Africa," a comparatively less pro-that an African film had been came out of its screening at Ken-phone directory, you will find at York, and then he would finally fessional production by the Gha-launched in the United States nedy Center two years ago com-least three pages of Ouedraogo. be reunited with his wife and nian Kwah Ansah. Insiders were film market on the same competi-plained of its immaturity. But It's like Smith here," he said with child in Paris saying that no English-speaking tive footing as that of American then again, it was Ouedraogo's a laugh. Ouedraogo appears to be a man African country like Ghana had films. Ouedraogo senses the cue to tional farming village and move

grade) in a country with no infra- val in April. structure to speak of, was a logis- At Cannes, the payoff came the exception of their storytellers, Ouedraogo took. bring him down.

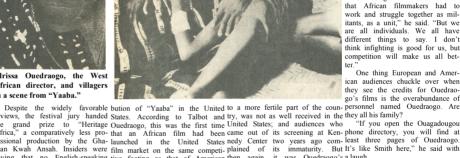

scamper frantically off a plane, 'It's a masterpiece.' " Afterward, like so many other African film Talbot spoke with the producer certain situations." makers, with the only copy of his Freddy Denaes, Pierre-Alain 'Yam Daabo'' ("The Choice"), draogo to become a filmmaker. premier. New Yorker to handle the distri-

first feature film.

who has mastered his craft and ever won the prize, and that after One might look at such an un- The 35-year-old filmmaker recount a story, and like the fable himself, after many struggles. 20 years of the Pan African Film dertaking as sheer folly. Oue-comes from a small village near about "Yaaba," the grandmother, During the making of "Yaaba," Festival, 1989 was going to be draogo doesn't film on slick Ouagadougou, and his parents, he gladly explains why Ouefor example, a close friend (to their year. Ouedraogo, from sound stages. His budget necessi-like 95 percent of his countrymen, draogo is such a common surwhom the film is dedicated) died French-speaking Burkina, picked tates that his set be no more com are farmers. If a Burkinabé stu-name in Burkina. It is a tale of an in a car accident during shooting; up the Prize of the Public, which, plicated that the roaming ex-dent shows himself to be promis- ancient king whose only child, a filming in the 110-plus degree in itself, was prestigious, and panses of the Sahel. And his ing in primary school, he comes princess, is carried on horseback heat (above 40 degrees Centi-waited for the Cannes film fest- actors are mostly vilagers, non- into the capital to continue his to the fortunate man she will marprofessionals, people who, with studies, which is the route that ry. In celebration, he names her Ouedraogo - a rough equivalent tical nightmare. Now not even "Yaaba" won the International are not linked to any sort of West. When he was in high school in to the French chevalier. the clouds of dust that rise from Critics Prize. And at its first er tradition in which mortals in the 1970s, Ouedraogo saved 25 Idrissa Ouedraogo, smiling, is the incessant buzz of orange screening, Daniel Talbot, the terrpter roles of dramatis perso-cents for weekends, the ticket obviously happy to be what he is scooters in his home village can president of New Yorker Films, nae, acting out things that have price for a movie at one of Ouaga-now, what he never expected to be sat with his wife in the audience. happened to other mortals. "I dougou's three outdoor cinemas in high school-a celluloid story-"Yaaba," costing $750,000 to Fifteen minutes into "Yaaba," he happened to outer montais. I sougou's little under the says, "We may not don't teach them how to act," Then, as today, the typical offer teller. As he says, "We may not make, would soon be in the can turned to her and said, "This is Ouedraogo explains. "The lines ings were karate and Indian ro-have a tradition of screenwriting festival rolled around in Febru- "It was fresh, new, and bril- are easy and often ad-libbed. I mantic musicals, or what the Oua- in Africa, but there is a great traresurvar noted atound in reordi "It was tresh, new, and bril-"" the stresh new, and bene splain to them what emo-galese call "les Hindous." dition of wild stories that we can ary, Ouedraogo would not have to liant," recalls Talbot. "I thought, tions I want them to feel under But it wasn't a noble motiva-base some very beautiful screen-scamer frantically off a plane, 'It's a masteroice'." A flerward tion to create an authentic Afri- plays upon." Ouedraogo's previous film, can cinema that spurred Oue-Marco Werman, who was a picture under his arm and rush to Meier and Ouedraogo, and a con-Yam Daabo' ('The Choice'), graogo to become a nummaker. Marco Werman, who was a the Ciné Burkina for its world tact was signed on the spot for about a family that makes a deci- He claims that he simply did not BBC correspondent in Burkina Burkina for its world tact was signed on the spot for the s sion to uproot itself from its tradi- want to become a teacher and that

Faso, wrote this for The New York Times